Faced with an impossible choice – to allow his people to be consumed by the plague of undeath unleashed by Mal'Ganis and the burning legion, or to commit an act of unspeakable atrocity – Arthas chose the latter. He ordered the slaughter of every citizen, condemning them before they could rise as mindless undead.

The Culling and the Betrayal

This brutal act, while intended to prevent a greater evil, shattered Arthas's spirit and reputation. The sword, a vessel of immense power and insidious whispers, promised Arthas the strength he craved to defeat his enemies. It was a temptation he could not resist.

The Pact with Darkness

The legend of Frostmourne is intertwined with the creation of the Lich King himself. The moment Arthas claimed Frostmourne, his soul was irrevocably bound to the blade. The sword's dark energy began to corrupt him from within, twisting his noble intentions into something far more sinister. His memories, his love for his people, and his very identity were slowly stripped away, replaced by the cold, calculating will of the Lich King.

The Betrayal of the Silver Hand

Upon returning to Lordaeron, Arthas was no longer the hero he once was. He had become a vessel for a dark purpose. In a shocking display of his corrupted nature, he turned on his own loyal knights, including his mentor Uther. He betrayed those who trusted him most, solidifying his transition from protector to destroyer.

This union created the ultimate Lich King, a being of immense power and terrifying will, wielding Frostmourne and commanding the unholy legions of the Scourge.

The Reign of the Scourge

As the Lich King, Arthas unleashed his undead army upon the world. The Scourge, a relentless tide of zombies, ghouls, and abominations, swept across continents, spreading death and despair. Cities fell, kingdoms crumbled, and the very fabric of life on Azeroth was threatened. The Lich King's reign was one of utter subjugation and eternal undeath.
